A travel blogger who found herself pregnant while backpacking in Asia and had to negotiate the minefield of social taboos and laws in order to get an abortion has shared her experience in the hopes of helping other women.

She shared her experience in a blog post titled 'Pregnant: Where to get an abortion in Asia' and told Daily Mail Australia the topic was not spoken about enough.

The British 31-year-old said that most were quick to assume she'd had a reckless one-night-stand, but despite people's assumptions, she wanted to educate women on the difficulties they may face while travelling solo.

Helping others: She wrote a blog post about her experience titled 'Pregnant: Where to get an abortion in Asia'

'I wrote that post at the start of my blog, and I think I'm the kind of woman who is very honest,' she said.

'I kind of woke up one day and thought I need to write about this, people don't talk about this enough.

'It happens, it's out there.'

Ms Nettleingham, 31, from Brighton, got pregnant when she had been in Thailand for about three months.

Breaking social barriers: She said abortion remained a taboo topic and was not spoken about enough

Jumping to conclusions: 'When I wrote the article people assumed I was drunk, they assumed I didn't know the guy, that it was a random encounter,' she said

She said while people assumed her pregnancy was the result of a one-night stand, that was not the case.

'When I wrote the article people assumed I was drunk, they assumed I didn't know the guy, that it was a random encounter,' she said.

'But actually me and this guy had been seeing each other for about six weeks.'

Unplanned pregnancy: She fell pregnant to a man she had been seeing for about six weeks, despite using protection

As Thailand does not have the medical or sexual health support that is readily available elsewhere, Ms Nettleingham had to travel to Chiang Mai city before she could even buy a pregnancy test.

When the results came back positive, Ms Nettleingham said she went in to 'robot mode'.

'I didn't even consider for one minute that I actually wanted to keep that child,' she said.

'My gut instinct was I do not want this, it's not at the right time in my life to do this, travel is number one for me.'

Not an option: 'I didn't even consider for one minute that I actually wanted to keep that child,' she said

She spoke with the man she had been seeing who said he supported whatever decision she made, and went online to Google her options.

'I was in Thailand at the time ... and when I did internet research it came up that abortion is illegal in Thailand,' she said.

'That's a big problem, I really wish I had access to more resources.

'I Googled quite a few places in Asia ... I sent them emails from Thailand and the nearest place I could go to was Cambodia.

Seeking help: Ms Nettleingham Googled her options and discovered abortion is illegal in Thailand

'About two years later I found out there's a brilliant restaurant called Cabbage and Condoms [in Thailand], and they run this restaurant but above the restaurant they have sexual health services.'

She got in touch with a service called Marie Stopes in Cambodia where she had a medical abortion.

Learning to cope: She sought medical help from Marie Stopes in Cambodia and said it was not until two months later that she started to address her decision on an emotional level

Ms Nettleingham said she continued to travel afterwards, and it was not until two months later that it hit her what had happened.

She took some time out and travelled home to England, but said when she told friends and family what had happened she was often met with a negative response.

She said before she even had a chance to explain her situation, both men and women would jump to conclusions thinking she had unprotected sex and risked her sexual health.

Breaking taboos: She hopes by sharing her story other women will know it's okay, it happens and not to feel ashamed

She shared her personal story on her blog as well as a guide to where women can get an abortion in Asia.

The information lists the services available in each country and whether or not abortion is legal there.

She said she wanted other women who might go through the same situation to know it's okay, it happens and not to feel ashamed.

I agree with her that with her self-centered behavior and immaturity for her age, she would be a horrible parent. She could avoid getting pregnant by just taking a little pill every day. But that would interfere with her carefree lifestyle. Instead she chose to kill her child, because children are inconvenient, and she couldn't be bothered. Now with her sense of superiority, she can produce a guide so other irresponsible people can kill their unwanted children. Don't try to say they are not children. They are. They are not cats, dogs or other animals that she would probably object to killing. They are human babies.
